

EMBEDDING
PREVENTION
OF VETERAN
SUICIDE

FAQs

Embedding Prevention of Veteran Suicide

FAQs

I noticed that applicants are encouraged to read the 'One Is Too Many Evaluation' Report, developed alongside the Westminster Centre for Research in Veterans / University of Chester, before completing their application, why is this?

We recommend that applicants read the 'One is Too Many' Evaluation, before completing their applications, as well as other Trust evaluations, as this new programme is designed to build on the success of previous Trust programmes, including the 'One is Too Many programme'.

Can our project focus on all three programme outcomes?

Yes, but we would recommend projects to strongly focus on one of the three outcomes in the programme guidance as an application that deeply focuses on one outcome, may be stronger than an application that attempts to address all three.

We are a charity that works with the Armed Forces and would like to apply under this programme, however we are currently behind in our reporting for another project that has been funded by the Trust. Are we eligible to apply?

Yes, however we may decline applications from current Trust grant holders if the reporting requirements for existing grants from the Trust are not up to date. If you have concerns about current outstanding reporting, speak with your Grants Manager.

The programme guidance mentions collaborative approaches, what does this mean?

Collaborative approaches mean organisations and members of the Armed Forces community, which could include individuals, groups or organisations, working together towards a common goal/outcome that might be difficult to accomplish independently.

In the types of projects section of the programme guidance, it gives examples under each programme outcome, does our project have to include these activities?

No, the examples are not an exhaustive list, and are meant for illustration purposes only.

Our project meets one of the programme outcomes strongly, however we have not sought the views of the Armed Forces community to see if our project is needed, should we still apply?

Yes, however we do strongly advise applicants to work with Armed Forces communities to help inform their project, and will ask for evidence in your application, of how people from the Armed Forces community have helped to shape your project.

You might consider working collaboratively with other Armed Forces organisations, to help you to deliver your project.

There is more information on this in our programme guidance, under, 'working with other organisations'.

The programme guidance states that projects will be required to work collaboratively with VPPP projects, do we have to start this work before we know if our application has been successful?

No, only successful applicants will be required to work collaboratively with VPPP projects.

Our organisation received funding in the first One Is Too Many programme. Are we allowed to apply this time?

Yes, you are eligible to apply under this new funding, however, please ensure that your proposed project meets the specific aims and objectives of this new programme.